Information

What is the role of a parenting investigator?

When parents are not able to resolve disputes about parenting time or rights and responsibilities, the dispute may go to trial for a judge to decide. Prior to the trial, the court may require the family to participate in a parenting investigation. A parenting investigator is then assigned who will gather information about the family to assist the judge in making the best decision about the child(ren).

What is the role of a guardian ad litem?

In any action for an annulment, divorce, legal separation, or other action affecting marriage, when either party has reason for special concern as to the future of the minor child(ren), and in any action when the parenting rights and responsibilities concerning the child is contested, either party to the action may petition the court for the appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent the child concerning parenting rights and responsibilities. A guardian ad litem shall serve as an advocate of the child's best interests. A guardian ad litem must be a licensed attorney.
